Women are stereotypically portrayed as home-makers and caregivers. This default role plays into the power dynamics inherent in our society. The government plays an important role in this dynamic by deciding what types of jobs women can take or not take. This is because although everyone recognizes the importance of equal opportunities for both men and women, it is hard for many to get past their ingrained beliefs regarding gender roles and aspirations. The government plays an important role in this dynamic by deciding what types of jobs women can take or not take. This is because although everyone recognizes the importance of equal opportunities for both men and women, it is hard for many to get past their ingrained beliefs regarding gender roles and aspirations. A good example of the government's role in gender roles can be seen in the 1982 Supreme Court decision, Street v. New York. In this case, a male motorist who did not comply with a female police officer's request to spread her legs while standing on one foot so that she could search her more thoroughly was convicted of violating the law against resisting arrest. The Supreme Court determined that there is no legitimate reason why men should not submit to such humiliating searches in order to ensure the safety of officers performing these searches or other pedestrians in public places. The Supreme Court determined that there is no legitimate reason why men should not submit to such humiliating searches in order to ensure the safety of officers performing these searches or other pedestrians in public places. The court justified its reasoning by comparing it to previous cases where women were compelled to endure strip searches and cavity searches before entering prison, which they deemed necessary for security reasons.
